We have some inspiring news from the International Space Station! A new study from researchers with the University of Leicester and ETH Zurich shows that exposure to the sun and carbon dioxide in Earth's atmosphere lowers the surface temperature of Mars (the thick atmosphere traps heat from the sun) and atmospheric density (the atmosphere is less dense than on Earth) which means the red planet may actually be warmer than we have been told previously. Mars has been a "hot topic" in the media over the past few years due to the discovery of what could be large numbers of life forms which continue to be detected by Earth based telescopes. We have explored how NASA, NASA's scientists and volunteers have covered this up to protect the idea that life may not exist on Mars. So how do these new findings affect the public perception? Could the new findings have a big impact on the discovery of life on Mars? For example, maybe the atmosphere on Mars is more like the atmosphere on Earth and not like the thick atmosphere on Venus (the hottest planet in our solar system). "The atmosphere is the key to understanding the habitability of planets," says Prof. Dr. Alexandra Dobrijevic from the University of Leicester, who led the study. "We have shown that although Mars is much colder than Earth, the presence of an atmosphere significantly increases the average temperature near the surface." One thing we discovered from viewing Earth from different orbital altitudes is that the atmosphere has a significant effect on the temperature near the surface, at certain altitudes. "Our study is not only important for understanding Mars, but also the Earth," adds Dr. Dobrijevic. "We can observe that the atmosphere has an important effect on the temperature of Earth," she explains. "It has been known since the 1950s and 1970s that the air temperature near the ground rises if the atmospheric pressure decreases, but the physical mechanism of this increase in temperature is still not well understood." The image above is an example of how the atmosphere affects the temperature of Earth and Mars, in addition to the effect that the Sun's light has on both planets. The study was published in Astrobiology: Furnes, G. J., Spiga, A., Belli, C. & Sanchez Alberca, A. "Temperature fluctuations over Mars with a simple climate model". doi:10
