It's not enough to have a backup plan. This article is available to subscribers only - in part now, and in full at a later date. To get the ebook version of what you want, contact solutions@washpost.com. We can't read the future, but one event may dominate our work in the years ahead: the rise of a catastrophic cyber-attack. That's the conclusion of the United States Institute for Peace, which projects that our country will face at least one global cyberattack every week by 2020. One of the most remarkable aspects of the problem will be the widespread — even unconscious — response to cybercrime: we tend to put a lot of faith in our ability to patch up damage to technology that we don't understand very well. That's been true since the Internet age: the only significant cyberattack before a decade ago was the infamous "Miracle" worm. Other attacks, notably Stuxnet, have been effectively patched when exposed. "The 'Miracle' worm was breathtaking because we thought we understood computers at the time, and we didn't," says Frank Pasquale, a cybersecurity expert at the University of Maryland and author of The Black Box Society: The Secret Algorithms That Control Money and Information. "As a result, we didn't appreciate that that attack could have as much power as it did. Today, we're a lot more prepared for the downside." In fact, it's not even clear yet how to defang an attack. There are no simple ways to do it. The best you can do, at the moment, is proactively build an infrastructure of resilience that includes two layers: A robust digital system that won't be impacted by a cyberattack and a "command and control" system that shuts down systems that become compromised. But we know too little about the ways attackers can
